

Rory Waterman

Reverdie

The broadened buzzard
glides in an orbit,
as if on a wire,
then twists, breaking free;

a bee revs its engine
and limps from stamen
to stamen, then lifts,
chicanes to the trees.

Your gaze follows one,
mine the other;
they mingle silently
in the thickening canopy.